for San Francisco and Oregon. Yesterday afternoon there was more ice in the North River than has been seen at any one time during the past fifteen years. Ships were firmly frozen in their berths, and men and boys were to be seen running on the ice in the docks all along the North

At pier No. 4, foot of Morris street, the southern steamers were held as tight by the ice around them as if they were secured by a vice. The steamer Southerner was lying near the upper end of the pier, and some half-dozen of her men were hard at work with axes cutting the ice from the stern, in order to back up and give room for the James Adger. One of the best places of observation on the North River is on pier No. 4, which is one of the longest on the Hudson. Here the spectator can see the entire lower bay to Staten Island at a glance, and looking in the opposite direction the Hudson as far as the Highlands is presented to the eye. This vast space, with the exception of a short distance on the Jersey side of the river, was one mass of floating ice. Now and then a cake of mirror-like ice, extending for a quarter of a mile in length, would come down with the tide, surrounded by small pieces of ice piled upon the top of each other.

At times the tide would rush along at a rapid rate, and the broken ice would rise up on end and fall over on the other, almost with as much regularity as if done by the hand of man. One of the Jersey City ferry boats, during the passages of one of the large cakes, managed to get out of her dock to go across the river. After getting towards the middle of the river, she was hemmed in; the machinery was then stopped, and she floated with the current for a few minutes. The pilot discovered an opening, however, and setting the engine again in motion, she gradually got out of her perilous position and proceeded to Jersey City

While this steamer was struggling through, another was waiting an opportunity to pass through the same opening to New York with passengers. A Hoboken steamboat, full of people, was fastened in the but finally succeeded in making a safe passage to this city. Between the ferry and pier No. 4, a number of men were walking on the ice in the river, during the afternoon

The United States mail steamer Illinois was de tained in her berth at the foot of Warren street about two hours beyond her time of departure. She was frozen in the dock, and the steam-tug Schultz had to be employed in breaking up the ice for her. At twenty minutes past four o'clock the bell was rung. and the Illinois began gradually to make her way into the river, and in about an hour got into the lower bay. She took out about seven hundred passengers. Four hundred of these were soldiers from Governor's Island destined for San Francisco and Oregon. The East River was this morning seriously obstructed by ice. About seven o'clock immense fields, covering the entire width of the river, passed up with the tide, and carried with it a number of steam, ferry, and other boats, which happened unfortunateon Monday for New Orleans, has as yet been unable of both. be cut out.
